Prosecutors & Police: Justice Department Misguided to Focus on Drug Crimes

Prosecuting Nonviolent Drug Offenses Shifts Resources Away From Violent Crime Prevention

Washington, D.C. – Amid speculation that the Department of Justice is considering a reversal of an Obama administration policy, known as “Smart on Crime,” which directed federal prosecutors to concentrate law enforcement efforts on the most serious criminals, rather than low-level drug crimes, Law Enforcement Leaders issued the following statement from Law Enforcement Leaders member and former United States Attorney for Utah Brett Tolman:

“To maintain law and order, we need effective policing and prosecution. The Justice Department’s expected shift to prosecuting and incarcerating more offenders, including low-level and drug offenders, is an ineffective way to protect public safety. Decades of experience shows we cannot arrest and incarcerate our way out of America’s drug problem. Instead, we must direct resources to treatment and to specifically combatting violent crime. This will help law enforcement do our jobs better.”

Earlier this year, Law Enforcement Leaders released a five-part policy agenda laying out how the President and Attorney General can best reduce crime and promote public safety. Its first recommendation calls for the Justice Department to focus enforcement on violent and serious crimes.
